In 2001, Siffredi embarked on his ambitious expedition to Everest. Armed with his snowboard, a camera, and a daring spirit, he set out to make history. He ascended the mountain with his team, establishing a base camp at 7,000 meters. From this vantage point, Siffredi could survey the vast expanse of snow and ice that lay ahead.

The Fatal Descent

On September 15, 2001, Siffredi prepared for his descent. His plan was to snowboard down the icy slopes of the North Face of Everest, a route fraught with crevasses and treacherous terrain. As he strapped on his snowboard, he was aware of the inherent risks but remained undeterred.

With a surge of adrenaline, Siffredi launched himself down the mountain. The initial descent was exhilarating, as he carved his way through the powdery snow. However, as he gained speed, the terrain became more treacherous. The wind howled around him, obscuring his vision, while unseen crevasses lurked beneath the snow.

At some point during the descent, Siffredi disappeared. The exact circumstances remain unknown, but it is believed that he may have fallen into a crevasse or been swept away by an avalanche. His camera, which contained the only footage of his descent, was never recovered.
